The Program's Basics Canvas Size This step determines the size of the drawing space. It is measured in pixels, with the most basic programs using a 512x512 window to work with, though this can be as high as 4096x4096 pixels. Most beginners starting with Photoshop will choose a 4096x4096 window for maximum image space. This is the default size option in Photoshop, though smaller sizes, 512x512 and 1024x1024 for example, are also available. Before moving onto the next step, check the setting for this window's resolution and size by clicking File > New. This will show you the canvas size options. The choice of a large canvas is recommended as it is the better option for seamless editing and resizing. Avoid the lower resolutions which will cause a tear. Raster Images vs. Bitmaps An image is composed of pixels. This means that a JPEG or TIFF image file is a collection of pixels, each with its own color. These pixels can be represented as a bitmap, or a raster image, which is a representation of a collection of pixels for photographic or graphic purposes. Think of bitmaps and raster images as the basis of all computer graphics. If you use a paint program such as Photoshop, you are manipulating an image. Most paint programs generate a bitmap from a drawing program like Photoshop as well, although there is a considerable amount of technical information relating to the type of pixels and their interpretation that is available in the sidebar. Raster images are more commonly used as they are the basis for print, television, and many other display media. When an image is presented on a screen, it is turned into a bitmap by a process called rendering. If you change the resolution of a raster image on the computer, the image becomes pixelated because the individual pixels used in that resolution are too small for the screen or projected. The Raster Image Is the Basis of a File Format A raster image file format is required if one wants to convert that image into a digital format for a final image or print product. Photoshop, as well as many other programs, uses a raster image file format, commonly known as a bitmap or BMP. Bitmaps or BMP files are often used to map a section of an image with another image. BMP is a Windows file format but can also be used to store a r

FDA Issues Guidelines for Labeling Pet Food The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has posted new guidelines for pet food labels, which include information about the source of proteins, the percent of crude protein, the nutrient content, and information regarding “fat-free” products. FDA issued its draft standards on August 14 after taking public comment on the matter. The agency says it will revise the guidelines every two years, and they are scheduled to be published in the Federal Register on Oct. 7, 2019. The final version of the final guidelines will be published in The Federal Register on Jan. 2, 2020, or 90 days from publication of the draft standard, according to FDA. FDA defines “fat-free” as the amount of fat in the food that will be half of the amount of fat in the traditional version of the food. The guidelines also require pet food labels to contain a nutrition declaration that includes “the source and percentage of crude protein, total dietary fiber and other nutrients, and any statements of function or value of the ingredient for the intended pet food use.” Pet food labels can be found at the retail level and on websites by searching for the product name and “label,” but many consumers may not be aware that the guidelines have been released.
